

Unite for children's environmental rights!

Learn about General Comment No 26 and how you can get involved

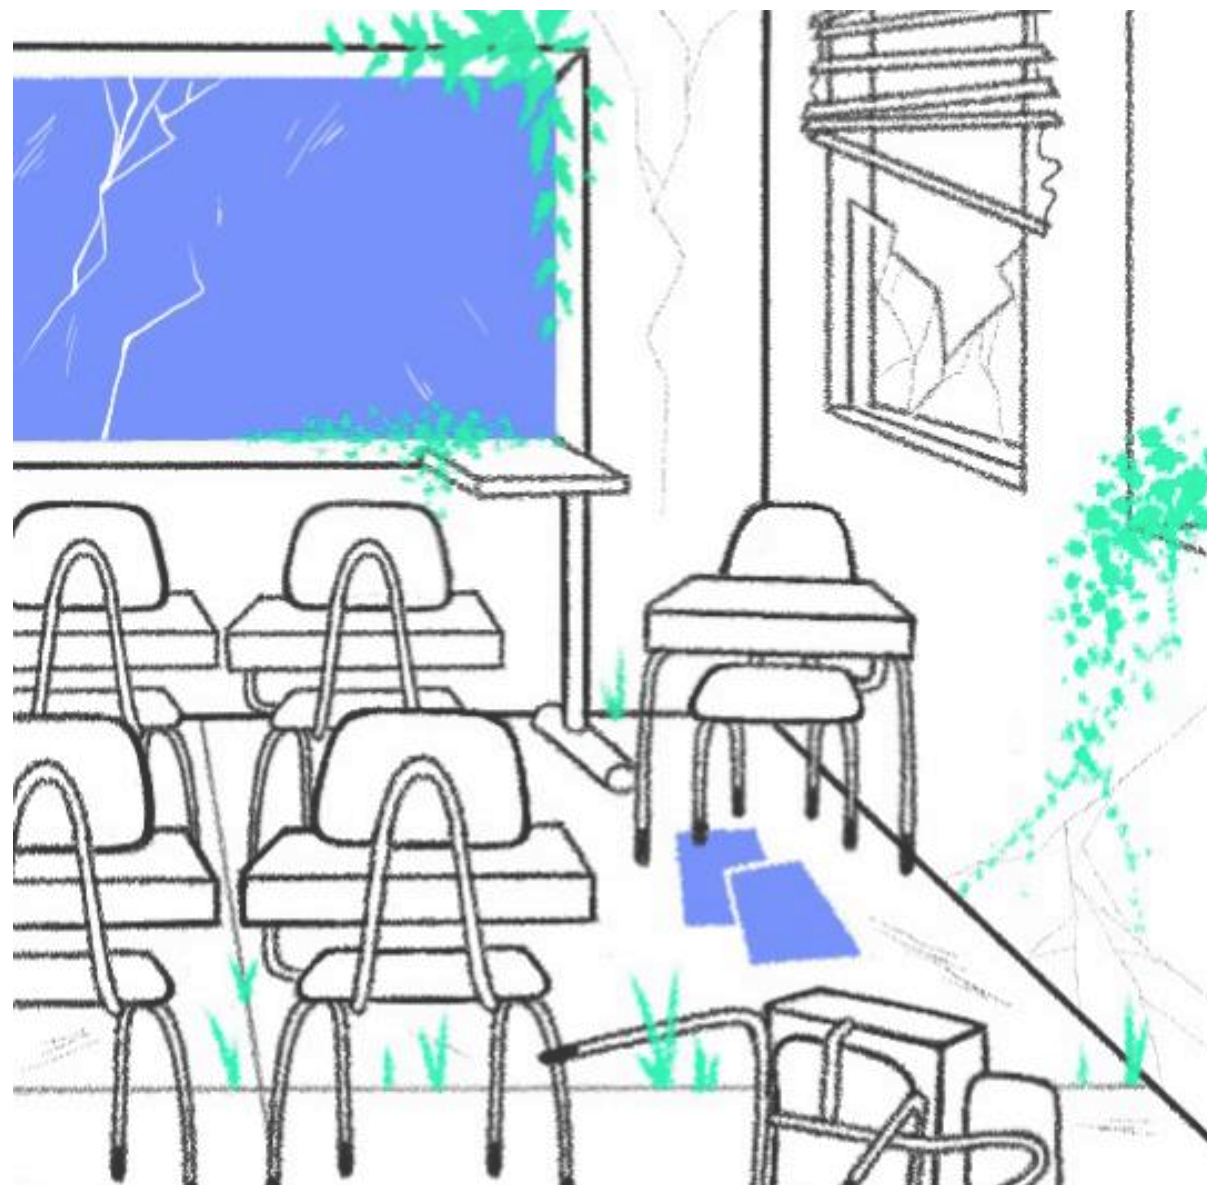

The environmental crisis is a child rights crisis.

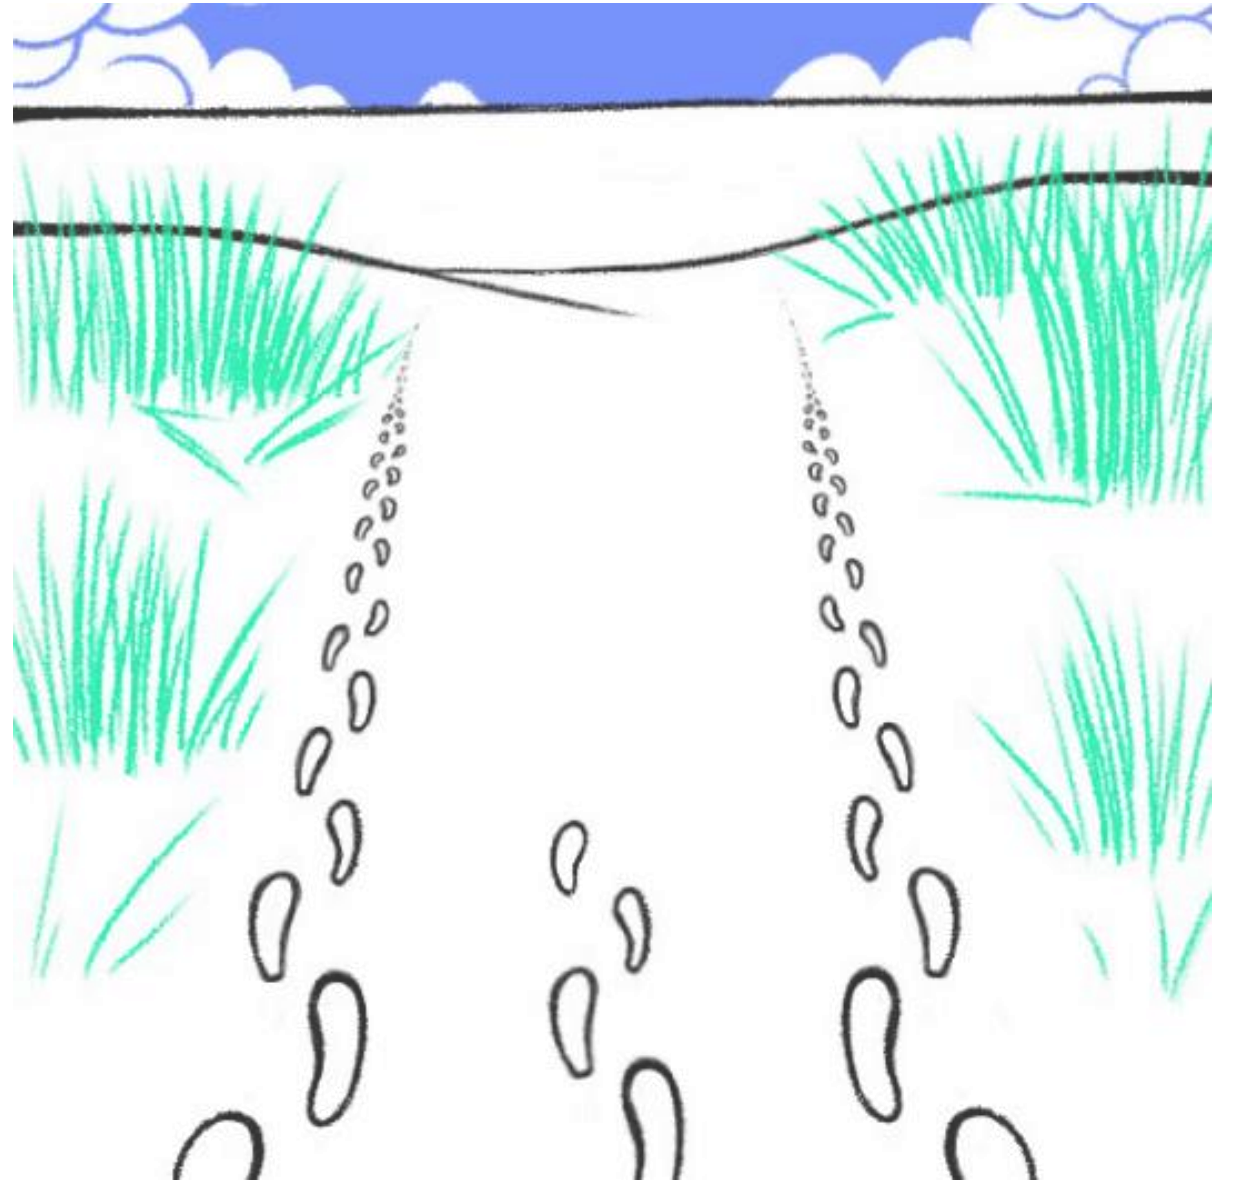

Children and young people are being forced to leave their homes,

missing out on school,

and losing their lives.

Children and young people are speaking up demanding action from governments.

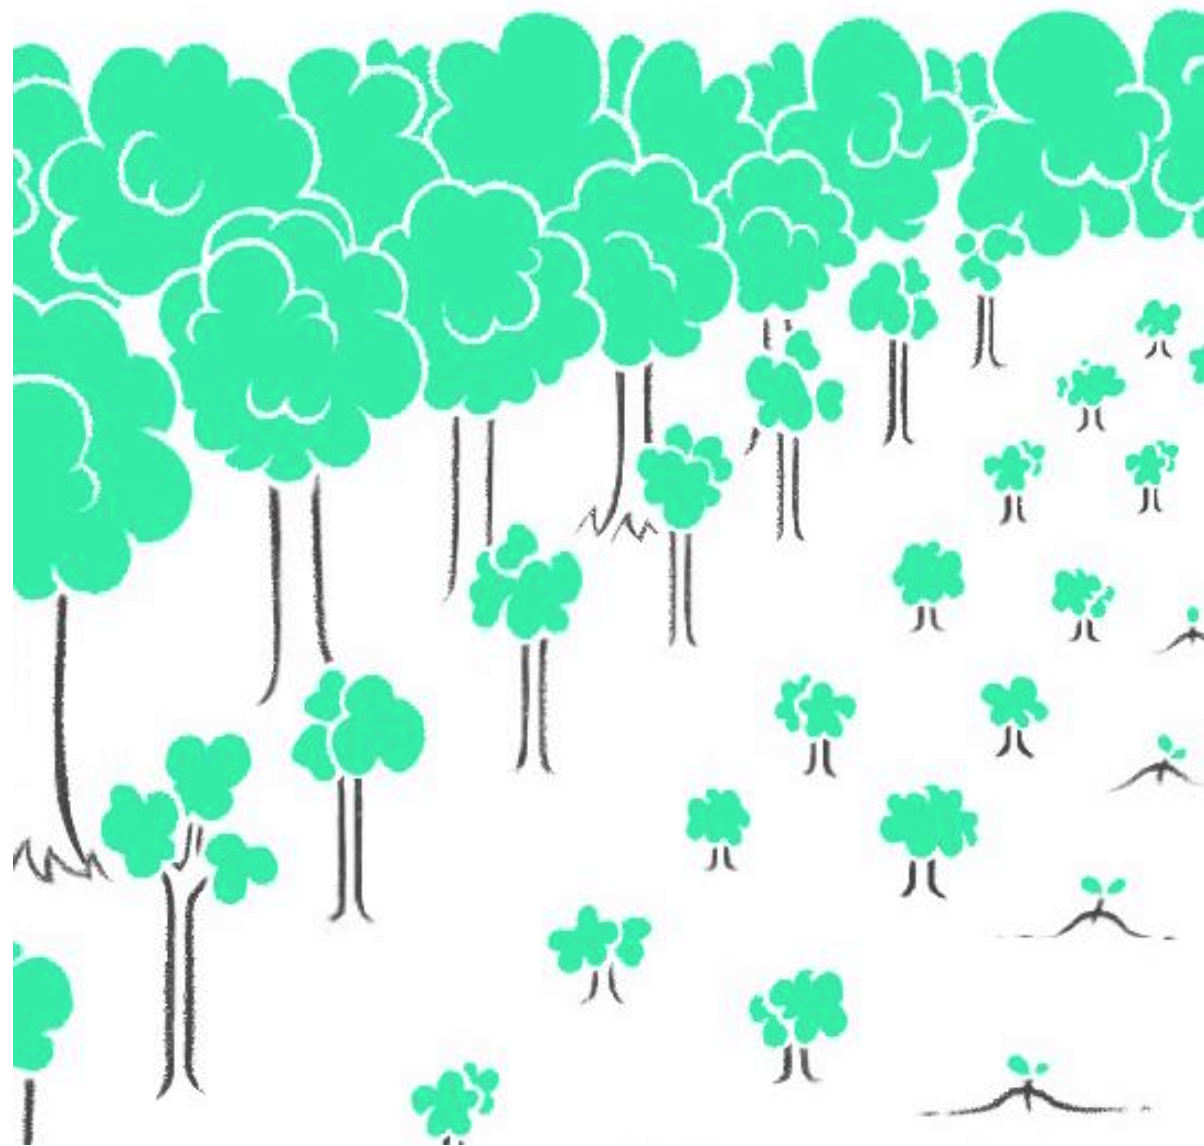

From marches and protests,

taking action online,

tree-planting, using art
and more.

The United Nations is listening to the calls of children and young people.

They are building guidelines for countries to protect children's rights affected by environmental harm.

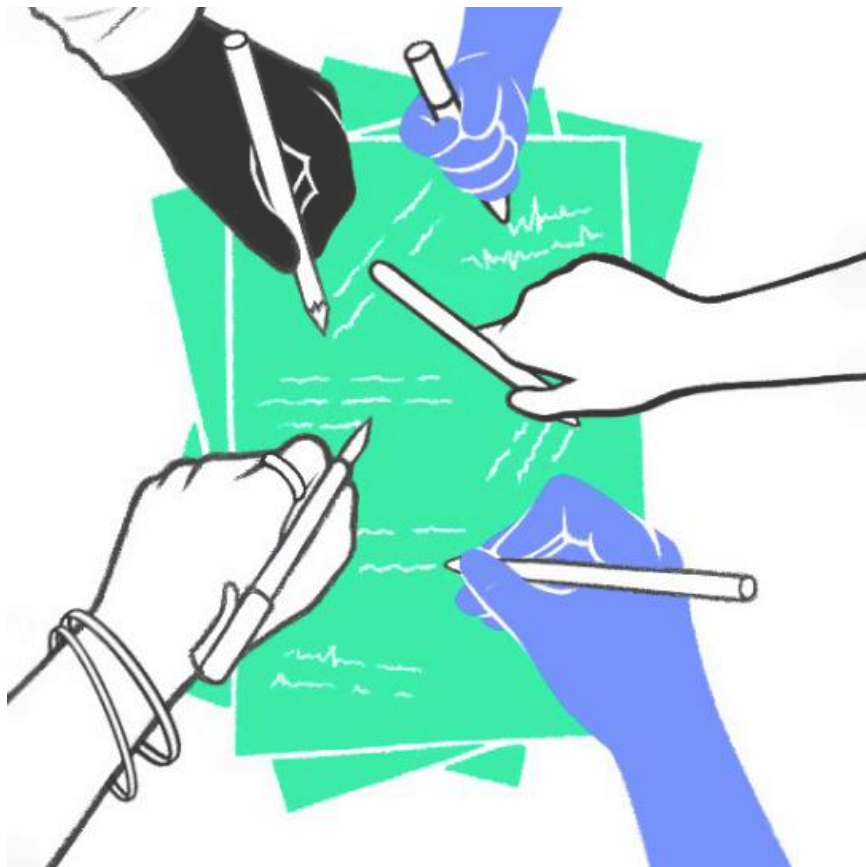

This significant guidance is also known as General Comment No. 26.

It will hold governments accountable when they violate children's rights and strengthen environmental action.

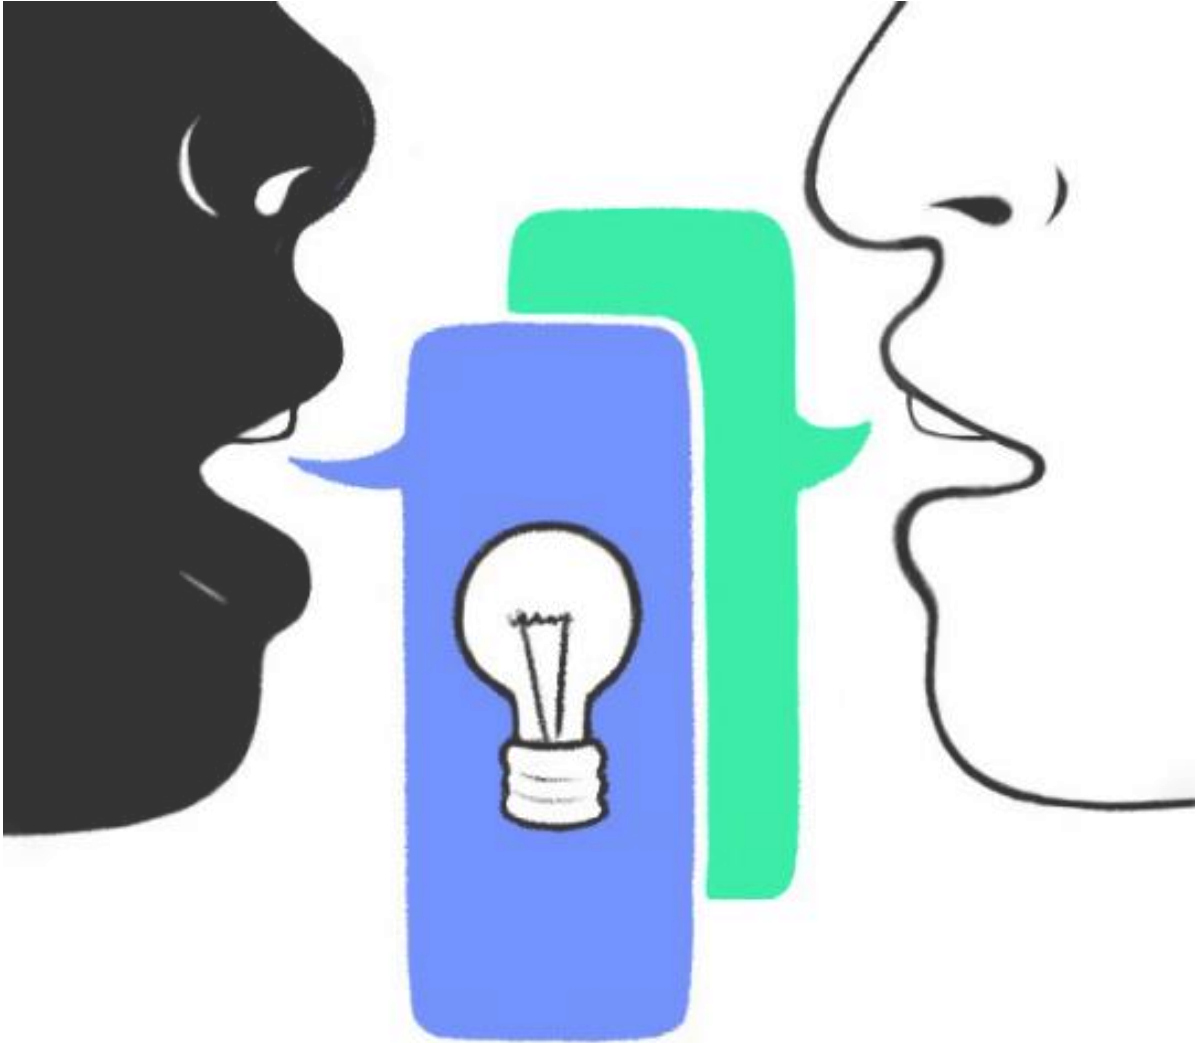

Children and young people worldwide are invited to help shape General Comment No. 26...

online questionnaires,

and discussions with people in their region.

Children and young people's views are important to creating
General Comment
No. 26.

They have a right to have a say in decisions about matters affecting them,

they offer unique insights into how environmental harm and climate change impacts children,

and they have lots of creative ideas and solutions!

Get involved and be a champion for children's environmental rights!

childrightsenvironment.org/get-involved

